Excerpt: . We passed through an extensive savanna, near the beautiful hills of Camiraoca; and by a pcrtrero of rich land, which the proprietor is beginning to convert into a sugar estate, we passed into the richest soil I have seen on the island, belonging to Mr . The cane was twelve or fifteen feet high; the soil black and loose; the oxen without slits in their nostrils; the negroes decently dressed; and everything wore the aspect of ease and comfort. We ascended the mountain, which separates Sumidero from; on its cleared height, we enjoyed a charming prospect. An extensive valley of the richest soil, extended itself west, and north, and east, with six sugar estates in view. The passes of Camiraoca interposed between us and the ocean at one point; but its waters and breakers were in view on the right and left of...
