Ibre, the maidens were walking in the King s garden, gathering roses of the white and red, and telling each other about this and that that was said at the ball, and about such and such that was worn; there, Maid-alone, seated by the ashy hearth, was eating her luncheon of scraps and listening to the Ratcatcher complain against the servants for saying that he was letting the rats eat up all the tallow that they had for candles; and yonder, in her lady s chamber, Dame Dale sat listening to what her daughters, Berrybright and Buttercup, were saying about the strange maiden who was the last to come into the King s ball. She came late and she sped away before the end to start people talking about her, said Buttercup. And her slippers! said Berry-bright. Was it noticed, I wonder, that...
