Excerpt: . . . cravat in which his neck was swathed. Fast as he came, it was evident that nothing escaped his attention; here he noticed an olen panel in a fanners fence, and there the leaking gut ter of a townsmans house; he cast a searching glance at every horse or ox he met, and courteously returned the greeting of young and old. As he was recogmzed by the anxious men in council, they rose instinctively from their seats on the court-house green, and an expression of welcome relief rose to every face. When one of them said, Let us consult Mr. Jefferson, he received no reply; he had only uttered what was in every mans heart at the same moment. So they invited their illustrious neighbor, who had but a short while before exchanged the White House, with all its high honors and severe labors, for the ease and comfort of his own Monticello, to join their council and to aid them by his advice. He dismounted with the alacrity of youth, carefully fastening the reins of his horse to the railing, as he had tied him to the palisades of the Presidents house in Washington after riding there on horseback to his inauguration; and, unscrewing the top of his cane he opened its three parts, which formed the legs of a stool, and seated himself on the ingenious contrivance, one of the many results of his own inventive skill. Then courteously acknowledging the honor done...
